Now we begin.

I decided I would take a gap year when I was in my last year of secondary school. My parents wanted me to go straight to university — they were keen for me to get qualified and start on a career. But I didn't want that. I was only eighteen and I knew that once I started my profession, I'd be stuck there until I retired, when I'm 65 or even 70 — who knows what the law will be by then?

I also felt I should get some experience of life, away from everything I'd ever known, you know, school and family. I thought that if I learnt to stand on my own two feet, I'd be able to cope with university better and get more out of my time there. I've heard that some students are so shocked by the changes in their lifestyle when they leave home that they give up university after only a month or two. I didn't want to risk that happening to me. So, I borrowed lots of travel books from the library and started to plan my special year. Whenever I got stressed with my school work I would look at the programme I'd made and dream of all the countries I was going to see. It kept me going and really encouraged me to work hard — it's good to have goals and aims in life, I think it gives you a purpose. Of course all this would cost me money, even if I stayed in the most basic of hotels and travelled by bus or train, not by plane, so I started to look for jobs I could do on my way round the world, and that's how I finalised my tour — by going to the countries where I could get employment.

I started off in September, after I'd got my exam results, and I went to pick fruit in France. Not very far and not very unusual, you may think, but I had a fabulous time. I met loads of other gap year students and in just a month I brushed up my French, which proved to be useful when I got to Vietnam later in the year. Then I moved on to Greece, where I worked in a bar on an island, and then on to South Africa, where I got a job on a farm. That was amazing — I learnt so much about working the land. And the animals I saw — ones I'd only ever seen in a zoo before. After that I travelled in the Far East as a tourist, so by the time I reached Australia I was broke. As the language was no problem I easily found two jobs, working as a waiter at night and dog-walking by day. When I left there I missed my four-legged friends. I spent the next three months in the United States and Brazil before coming home.

My friends were amazed at how I'd changed — I'd become more confident and I'd changed physically, much thinner. That was because of all the hard work I'd done, and sometimes I had been too poor to buy much food! But it had been the most amazing year of my life — and life-changing. During the year I'd grown to love animals so much I decided to give up my plan to go to university and become a farmer. My parents were so upset at first, but now they can see I'm happier than I've ever been. I'd recommend a gap year to anyone — you Just never know how it'll turn out!
